April 16th, 1917.

My darling sweetheart Lou:-

Your very welcome letter of the 13th (even though it was hoodoo day) received & believe me, honey, I was glad to hear you enjoyed yourself at my mother's. See to it that Rose & mother go over to your house on the day they promised.

I'm feeling much better now, when I wear my glasses. They don't need changing, but I believe I ought to wear them continuously & if I do, they (my eyes) won't pain me. My glasses have such a soothing effect that they comfort my eyes to a great extent, but, of course, I'm stubborn & therefore I don't wear 'em as much as I have to.

I showed the classmate of mine that part of your letter about me coming home & all he did was to reiterate his previous statements, that he will do all he can to help me. As I have already written you, it all depends on the sale of the stock. The sale is on for the 19th that comes on Thursday of this week, & I sure do hope everything will come out as I thought. Sweetheart mine, talking about longing for you! Well, last night

I dreamt of you & could have sworn that I had you in my arms, but, then I went, & woke up, only to find that I had been dreaming. Oh, Toots, Toots, if I could only be with you!

I shall have to close now as I must run to the Court House & attend to something, so by-by till to morrow,

Lovingly,

Joe.
